

What might stop a negotiated Article 50 agreement? (28 February 2019)

Simon Usherwood

Article 50 states that if no agreement is found by the end of two years after notification, then a member state leaves in any case. Why might this happen?

The Risk	Why might it happen?	Likelihood of preventing agreement	Change since Jan.
Tory party revolt	Continued lack of support for Withdrawal Agreement or for May, even if there is no consensus about alternative models	High	No change
UK Parliamentary revolt	No obvious majority for new Meaningful Vote or any alternative path, except no to no-deal	High	No change
UK government is unclear on objectives	May has sought renegotiation on backstop, but without clarity about what this might involve	Low	No change
Radical hardening of UK position	Possible consequence of Parliamentary impasse, to win over hard Brexit/no-deal elements, but limited by need to keep softer MPs on-side, especially following defections to TIG	Low	No change
EU27 fail to agree position	The critical time pressure might open up cracks in EU27 unity, but none visible yet	Very Low	No change
European Parliament refuses to accept agreement	No sign that this will be a problem at all, unless renegotiation occurs	Very Low	No change
Non-ratification by an EU27 assembly	Almost inconceivable at this stage	Zero	No change
Insufficient negotiating capacity	No longer an issue, given limited agenda around outstanding Withdrawal Agreement problems	Zero	No change
Disagreement over sequencing of agreement	Sequencing is no longer an issue on either side, as they move into Phase 2	Zero	No change